

This project began with a photo I took during the band and color guard's halftime performance. To create this design, I used Photoshop. Once in Photoshop, I first duplicated the image and copied it. I then created a cutout of what I would like to be in color. With the second copy of the picture, I edited it to black and white. Once I had a colored cutout and a black and white background, I layered them together with the colored cutout on top. To complete the image, I created a frame. The frame covers the black and white image while being covered by the colored cutout. This process took me approximately two class periods and matches our yearbook's theme "Unframed" perfectly. The subject of the photo is stepping out of the frame and into the next phase of their show, Seasons Change.
